Learning the details about how the social networking sites that are popular with teens and young people work is becoming “required” education for responsible adults. Learning about the positive aspects of the sites and the opportunities they provide for communication, growth, and development of social skills is only one aspect of that education. Parents also have to learn the risks of participating in this type of online communication. In addition to educating themselves, they must teach their children about the sites and the risks involved with participating.

In addition to screening information for the site before posting it in order to assure that there is no personal information or identifying information on the site, parents need to pay particular attention to details in photographs that could provide a predator with clues about where the teen lives, goes to school, or works. They also need to talk honestly and openly with their young people about the risks of expressing emotions online. Responsible adults have probably already discouraged children from communicating with strangers online. However, you, and they, may not realize that the thoughts, feelings, and ideas that they share through online journals or poetry posted on their social networking site can be accessed by anyone on the Internet. This means that predators can and do read their private communications—even when they are marked private. Predators use this information to target specific children or young people as possible victims. Social networking sites are a great source of information for predators. Make sure children and young people are fully aware of the risks and dangers attached to putting information on these sites and using them for communication with their friends.

An essential part of Internet education and the “house rules” about using the Internet is consistent reinforcement of a very important message. “Never agree to meet in person with someone you met on the Internet.” In a cyber communication, strangers can become like “friends” rather quickly. They have the same interests. They seem really nice. They seem to really care about the young person and what is happening in his or her life. Young people have trouble seeing that these people are still strangers. They are not people known by the family or the young person. Remind your teens and young people that those they meet online are strangers and they would never willingly go off with a stranger in any other venue. Online conversation does not make this person less of a stranger.

Eliminating social networking sites from a child’s life is an unrealistic expectation. As caring adults it is more important than ever to understand these sites and communicate with young people about the benefits, risks, and dangers of this form of communication.
The information and opinions provided on The Virtus® Forum are for educational purposes only. No attorney-client privilege or any other privilege granted under law is intended. Users who seek legal or other professional advice do so at their own risk.

Opinions of experts expressed on The Virtus® Forum are not necessarily the opinions of sponsors or The Virtus® Forum. The Virtus® Forum does not guarantee the validity of any expert opinion.

(Acceptable Use Policy)